This is referred to as a nomothetic approach, although in fact any general rule proposal has been disproved. The Chrysanthemum and the Sword : Patterns of Japanese Culture. Two solutions for identifying the cause were proposed in 19th-century social science.

Motoori, the greatest nativist scholar, is deeply indebted, for instance, to the thought of the most penetrating Confucian thinker of Tokugawa times. These scholars worked independently, and reached different conclusions, but by the 19th century were grouped together by a neo-Kokugakuist named Konakamura to establish the earliness of Japanese self-awareness. On the other hand, scholars who leaned more toward the humanities proposed solution B : ascertaining the cause by observing the phenomenon individually.

The questions are rendered more complex by the fact that in the early post-war period, the restoration of a 'healthy nationalism' was by no means something exclusive to right-wing cultural thinkers. The Japanese language is also uniquely vague. The key question posed in Ekō Yagi's Taiwa no ba o dezainsuru is related to this case: how can experts establish trust with citizens? Jinkogaku Kenkyu Journal of Population Research 10:33—41.
