Pies from Nowhere: How Georgia Gilmore Sustained the Montgomery Bus Boycott by Dee Romito

Escalating tensions with Creek tribes erupted into open war with the United States following the destruction of the village of Roanoke, Georgia, located along the Chattahoochee River on the boundary between Creek and American territory, in May 1836. The Author's Note holds impressive facts not found in the text. For more on the Nye Investigation, see Wayne S.

Georgia

They started raising troops and prepared for war. But food shortages only worsened, especially in the towns.

RANKIN, Jeannette

When I opened the book the first thing I saw was a picture of a pie and it looked so good it made my stomach growl and all of the illustrations assisted in drawing me into the story. It included numerous examples of furniture, textiles, pottery and metal work, present a synthesis of Green Center work, showed new research and pointed the way for future research in Georgia-related decorative arts.

Material Georgia 1733

Loved reading this biography of Georgia Gilmore, a woman of will, strength, and courage who helped the Montgomery Bus Boycott succeed through her gift of fine food. They are tied up with insecurity.
