Seven Eleven

With Hampton gone, the 7-Eleven shrinks, tightening on me.

Seven Eleven

He leaves, as always, with a wink and a toothy grin, his heavy laugh hanging in the air long after the door has closed on his back. My college books are under the counter, but who can think at this hour? All the time she chatters in Polish. The shoplifters have stolen and gone.

Meanwhile, shuffling between the aisles, the Strange Old Lady with the grey babushka and the soft brown moustache mutters to herself in some ancient dialect of Polish. I doze intermittently, standing up. He chews slack-jawed and open-mouthed, masticated food rolling around on his tongue, then shoves a fistful of grubby bills across the counter and belches in my face as I take the money.

I take the crumpled bills from fingers stained with nicotine and diesel oil, avoiding eyes that have that long-distance, interstate stare. Above the staccato CHUNKA-CHUNK of AK-47 fire and grenade explosions I hear them giggling as the electronic body count soars into triple digits. As though rehearsed, once in the store they split up and disappear down separate aisles.

Seven Eleven

The faces beneath the baseball caps and hoodies are doughy and unformed, an anonymous smudge of stupidity. When he punches out as a delivery driver, Hampton punches in at his other job at the Ford stamping plant.

I watch them stride across the parking lot, flattened down to two dimensions by the gaunt yellow glare of the sodium lights. Their rigs startle to life in a flash of headlights and a snort of black diesel soot, then they rumble out of the lot and grind toward the nearby interstate.

He curdles my stomach by nuking a hot dog in the microwave, splooging it with yellow gunk from the cheese pump, and scarfing it down in front of me. Again, I feel that familiar tightening in my guts. The weasel-faced one sports enough facial piercings to set off every metal detector in Metro airport and skinny arms wallpapered with tattoos.
