Margaret Atwood

Why do you think Atwood is so interested in exploring this particular topic? Given this burden of complexity, any simple conclusion to Surfacing is out of the question. Toronto, Press, 1968; Boston, Little Brown, 1969.

Margaret Eleanor Atwood

Nor is she conscious that her attitude toward women includes contempt, revulsion and suspicion, and that this weak-ens and impoverishes her even more since she is herself a woman. Like other female poets who came of age in the 1960s, and like other Canadian writers who have long been aware of the political and cultural domination of their country by outside forces, Atwood is extraordinarily sensitive to the ways in which power relations between humanity and nature, between men and women, and between nations shape the modes of representation, the methods of reading and writing, through which we make sense of our lives. Other for children Up in the Tree.

Politics, Violence, and Victimization in Margaret Atwood's Selected Novels

The Circle Game takes this opposition further, setting such human constructs as games, literature, and love against the instability of nature.

The Edible Woman

In Power Politics the grimmer, more mordant phases of Atwood's sex-war feminism become evident in poems with the power of a less vulnerable, more life-affirming. Science, November 14, 2003, Susan M. re-establishment of her ties with civilization. Lawrence award, 1978; Radcliffe Medal, 1980; Molson award, 1981; Guggenheim fellowship, 1981; Welsh Arts Council International Writers prize, 1982; Ida Nudel Humanitarian award, 1986; Times Book award, 1986; Arthur C.

Margaret Eleanor Atwood

The other Atwood is the author of Lady Oracle and an earlier The Edible Woman, a comic novel about a young woman who escapes a conventional marriage by raising her consciousness in the nick of time. By skillful juxtaposition of past and present through the use of flashbacks, Atwood evokes compelling fictional landscapes that ironically comment on the untenable state of modern men and women. Review of The Animals in That Country.
