Philosophy Gone Wild

How does it relate to the Darwinian portrait of nature red in tooth and claw? These essays discuss the environmental turn in philosophy. Precisely what are these values carried by natural things? How are they to be traded off against other human values, against the legitimate and not-so-legitimate demands of industry, business, development? Is nature only a resource for human needs, natural things accordingly having merely instrumental value? Have we duties to endangered species, or, again, only duties to persons concerning rare species? Precisely what are these values carried by natural things? Are these to be located in organic individuals or in their biological communities, the whole of which the organism is a part? What, after all, is the nature of nature, and what experiences encountering nature are appropriate in the light on contemporary bioscience and of philosophical criticism? The questions come in many forms: Have we any duties to natural things at all, or merely duties to persons concerning natural things? Is nature only a resource for human needs, natural things accordingly having merely instrumental value? Have we duties to animals, perhaps at least to sentient animals? Are the values associated with nature subjective or objective? Are these to be located in organic individuals or in their biological communities, the whole of which the organism is a part? Are the values associated with nature subjective or objective? Rolston initially taught philosophy at Hampden-Sydney College in 1958, before becoming pastor of the Walnut Grove Presbyterian Church in Bristol, Virginia, where he remained until 1967.

Or are there intrinsic values in ecosystems, apart from human concerns? Nature is perhaps the most ancient philosophical category, yet few others are of greater current relevance. He writes with flair and grace.
