The Life of a Sportsman by Nimrod

Lesson 2: Getting better never stops! Finally, the sprite of sportsmanship demands cheerfulness even in the face of a defeat.

1842 The Life of a Sportsman

In fact, the horse and his rider appeared to reform themselves together. This upright division of the money would never have been known to the family had they not chanced to have been made acquainted with it through an unlooked-for channel, when all was put straight between the parties. But our hero's opinion of the hounds shall appear in a letter he wrote to his friend Lord Dauntley, after huntins with Lord Lonsdale's hounds on the following day, ana once more with Lord Seffon's.

Sportsmanship

Again, the country hunted by him was one likely to make a man both a qmrtsman and a hOTseman, being full of large covers, very strongly fenced, and noted for the stoutness the ditemations which occur in the taste for all national sport ; but that it has stood the test of ages is a fact too well established to admit of a doubt, as well as that a moral has been drawn from it. The setting or handling of the cocks is also a most difficult art ; in fact, I have no hesitation in saying, that not only does a cockpit include more natural talent, in the rough, than any other place in which men of all descriptions are given to congregate, but that, unless a man be a man of talent, he has no business to enter one. And now let me introduce to the reader my hero's college friend, Hargrave.
