The Critical Period of American History

The treaty with England was not concluded until the consent of France had been obtained, and thus the express stipulation was respected ; but a thorough and de tailed agreement was reached as to what the pur port of the treaty should be, while our not too friendly ally was kept in the dark. It was only too plain, as he mournfully confessed, that American credit was dead. No state could engage in war except by way of defence against a sudden In dian attack.

The articles were signed on the 30th of November, six days before the meeting of Parliament. But nine years had elapsed since, in the first Continental Congress, they had begun to act consistently and independently in common, under the severe pressure of a common fear and an im mediate necessity of action. The document is signed by all but three of the delegates.
