The World Economic Forum rates Botswana as one of the two most economically competitive nations in Africa. A successor to the SADCC, which focused its efforts on freeing regional economic development from dependence on apartheid in South Africa, SADC embraced the newly democratic South Africa as a member in 1994 and has a broad mandate to encourage growth, development, and economic integration in Southern Africa.

Economy of Botswana

The stock exchange implemented a Central Securities Depository in 2007. At the same time, increased diamond market volatility—including growing competition from synthetic diamonds, reduced Southern African Customs Union transfers and fiscal expansion have resulted in eroded fiscal buffers.

Economy of Botswana

The economy is subject to global downturns in the market for diamonds.

Botswana Economic Outlook

Despite a challenge from a party led by former President Ian Khama and other opposition groups, the BDP expanded its share of the vote in the October 2019 elections, securing the continued tenure of President Mokgweetsi Masisi. If successful, it will give Botswana companies free access to the far larger regional market. Botswana has in turn put in place plans to become a net exporter of power to the regional pool, through governmental expansion of the Morupule power station, as well as encouraging private investment in the form of a 4 gigawatt power station by the Canadian greenfield company CIC Energy.
