The Position of the Meiji Era as a Period in Japanese Literature Various Methods of Dividing Japanese Literature into Periods i — Meiji Literature Seen from the Three-Period Division Method of Ancient, Medieval, and Modern Eras 3 — A General Survey of the Literary Currents Introduced in the Meiji Era G 2. The epic poems of Kyukin and Ariake drew on old legends for their material, but we cannot say that the ideas of Shinto were expressed in a religious way. It also is undeniable that Naturalism, which appeared in the closing years of the Meiji Era at the peak of the influence of Western literature, once in Japan be- came a Japanese Naturalism with its own peculiar character- istics, and also that the Symbolist poetry of the West was totally Japanized and acquired a direction characteristically Japanese.

KOIZUMI Yoshiyuki

In the Naturalistic era the Waseda Shisha Waseda Poetry Society 1907 and the Jiyushisha The Free Verse Society 1909 became the breeding ground of free verse. ShSyd and Ogai had different standpoints, but they both recognized that literature was an art that had beauty as its objective.

Soseki was a student of English literature, and he introduced a new psychological approach in his Bun- gakuron A Study of Literature ; also, as the title of his Bungei no Tetsugakuteki Kiso The Philosophical Basis of Literature indicates, he was concerned with philosophical problems, and since the intellectual content of his novels was for the most part an idealistic rationalism, he occupies a position near Ogai. There are startling resemblances to the Western Medieval Era. Koya also did translations of Lafcadio Hearn known in Japan as Koizumi Yakumo and Rossetti, while Hyokyo produced translations of Goldsmith, Irving, and Dickens.

Even Shoy5 in his early period discussed the realistic novel under the name of bijutsu.

Mainichi

Nakae Chomin Atsusuke and others who propounded the doctrines of freedom and equality also stood on the side of Europeanization. We have seen above how Meiji literature maintained its relationship with such areas of spiritual civilization as science, morality, and religion. Report , online journal, November 2017.

Editors

The establishment of the Symbolist poetry of Kitahara Hakushu and Miki Rofu also took place at this time.
