Faust (opera)

Méphistophélès is turned away by the shining sword of the archangel.

Faust (1926)

Faust sends Méphistophélès in search of a gift for Marguerite and sings a Salut, demeure chaste et pure idealizing Marguerite as a pure child of nature.

Faust (2000)

Plays and comic puppet theatre loosely based on this legend were popular throughout Germany in the 16th century, often reducing Faust and to figures of vulgar fun. Marguerite prays in the cathedral, set design by After being made pregnant and seemingly abandoned by Faust, Marguerite has given birth and is a social outcast.

Faust (opera)

In the Murnau version of the tale, the aging bearded scholar and alchemist, now disillusioned—by a palpable failure of his antidotal, dark liquid in a phial, a supposed cure for victims in his plague-stricken town—Faust renounces his many years of hard travail and studies in alchemy. The two plays have been published in English under a number of titles, and are usually referred to as Faust, Parts One and Two.

Faust (opera)

As God and the Devil wage a war over Earth, the two opposing powers reach a tentative agreement: the entire fate of Mankind will rest on the soul of Faust, who must redeem himself from his selfish deeds before the story is complete.

Faust (2000)

Marguerite goes to the church and tries to pray there but is stopped, first by the sadistic Méphistophélès and then by a choir of devils. During a plague, Faust despairs and burns his books after failing to stop death; Satan sends Mephisto to tempt Faust, first with insight into treating the plague and then with a day's return to youth.
