Breaking Down the Barriers to Innovation

An example of this was provided by Judith Rowe Princeton University , who pointed out that there are two kinds of Organizational and Process Barriers Some barriers can be thought of as structural in nature—that is, they exist because of processes imposed on an agency as a unit in the federal government. This evolving ecosystem has great potential for organisation and companies to tap into the immense knowledge that an organisation can hardly provide on its own. Leaders can also help underrepresented colleagues develop meaningful support systems by creating opportunities for connectivity, which can improve retention.
