Highland Light Infantry. World War One Photos, Obituaries & Service Records

All along the enemy's line we could see bayonets appearing above the parapet and there is no doubt that he intended to attack, but, apart from the few who actually left the trenches, the attack did not develop.

World War One

While living in camp at Mudros efforts were made to improve generally the feeding of officers and men, and as there were more canteens on the island with greater variety of goods for sale than we had been accustomed to on Gallipoli, our efforts met with a certain amount of success. We were now rejoined by the Transport Section, and Major Jowitt and his party also returned. World War One

All forenoon rumours were floating about that arrangements were being made for an attempt to retake the Vineyard by troops on our left. A detachment of these people would frequently visit our trenches, take up a position and proceed to bombard the enemy's line and bomb saps with doubtful success.

Highland Light Infantry in the Great War

No patrol could possibly venture out into such a storm. Several officers who had been wounded or sick now rejoined us, including Captains Brand and Beckett and Lieut.

But the General had reckoned without the flies. Josie's memory was kept alive by his family and he was never forgotten by his three younger sisters. Though, of course, roofless, it afforded a measure of safety from shells, but one shudders to think what would have been the effect had a high explosive landed on the table while a meal was in progress.
