If students have finished the tutorial they are ready to start the performance task in the next lesson. Doing summary statistics tables with this package is very easy and I like this package almost as much as the arsenal package. This week, we consider the SUMMARIZE function and create customised summary tables in Power BI.

For that performance task students might find some raw data while doing research and might create a new artifact that is a summary table of the data that reveals some interesting aspect of it. I can see this as a very useful approach for building your own custom flavor of pandas functions. If I change some of the data, you'll see the summary table update instantly.

With a lot of summary statistics tables, it is difficult to display missing values in a proper way and oftentimes, there is only one default method that cannot be changed.

Summary Tables

Think: how could data be grouped? The purpose here is to acquaint students with using such a tool and to expose this power. While seemingly mundane, a spreadsheet is an extremely powerful tool for working with data. The following summary table displays the results of this program: TruBlend Coffee Makers, Inc.
