John Galsworthy

There was something undignified in parasitically clinging on to the effortless close of a life wherein he regretted two things only—the long division between his father and himself when he was young, and the lateness of his union with Irene. Soames saw him glancing round, and Fleur looking after them as the three went out.

The Forsyte Saga

He found his grandfather's carriage at the door, and his mother in furs, with the appearance of one going to a Mansion House Assembly.

The Forsyte Saga

He was not a highly educated little boy. Men are, in fact, quite unable to control their own inventions; they at best develop adaptability to the new conditions those inventions create. There was a lovely smell, too, in his open window.

Main Characters in John Galsworthy's Forsyte Saga Essay

But it was at her lips - asking a question, giving an answer, with that shadowy smile - that men looked; they were sensitive lips, sensuous and sweet, and through them seemed to come warmth and perfume like the warmth and perfume of a flower. He had had to keep it to himself, of course, so that not even the drawing-master knew of it; but it was there, fastidious and clear within him. For Dartie himself was in capital form, and talked freely, with a certain poignancy, being no fool.
