He was attacked by friends from school when he showed up in the neighborhood dressed differently from the others. Last July, Heller had to beg the director of the Beit Shemesh primary schools department, Uri Ben Hamo, before the latter referred him to a few local state-religious schools; there, the principals shooed him away. Or when two sons from a respected family of the extreme Toldot Aharon sect left with their families to pursue a secular way of life.

Moreover, the difficulty in finding data is also due in part to the way people are leaving today: In contrast to the past, not everyone who leaves the Haredi world today classifies himself or herself as secular per se. They keep harping on lascivious stories and feed the rabbis with fear of images of women.
