Clara Hopgood, by Mark Rutherford

The father was accordingly prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. With a down, hey down, hey down, God send every gentleman Such hawks, such hounds, and such a leman. There was nothing new in it, but formally it was something, like the tolling of the bell when we know that our friend is dead.

I cannot be altogether happy with anybody unless I know I make him happy. Sick at heart and despairing, she could not help being touched, and she thought to herself how strange the world is—so transcendent both in glory and horror; a world capable of such scenes as those before her, and a world in which such suffering as hers could be; a world infinite both ways. I do admire him so much; I am sure you would like him.

For the song it was settled that Frank Palmer should be asked, as he would be in Fenmarket. Had she believed in the common creed, her attention would have been concentrated on the salvation of her own soul; she would have found her Redeemer and would have been comparatively at peace; she would have acknowledged herself convicted of infinite sin, and hell would have been opened before her, but above the sin and the hell she would have seen the distinct image of the Mediator abolishing both.

She had been brought up, as thoroughly as a woman could be brought up, in those days, to be a governess. It is not in me. Partly also the cause was that those who care to speak about what is nearest to them are very rare, and most persons find conversation easy in proportion to the remoteness of its topics from them.
