Results of a new study suggest that students whose parents are interested in math and perceive their own math competencies to be high perform better than students with parents who show a low interest in math and regard their competencies in the domain as equally low — regardless of the intensity of the help students receive at home.

Parent involvement

Only few of the parents told that only mother or father is in contact with teacher Fig. The mothers predominantly had a junior high-school education or technical secondary school education 41.

Parents' motivation influences students' academic outcomes

School districts need to consider how they will educate parents to use different technology tools to guide their decisions. We have always wanted to be perfect parents and we expect our children to grow up in a perfect manner. Research conducted to date suggests that parental help with children's homework yields little positive influence on Asian American and Asian immigrant students' academic achievement even though such involvement appears to boost European American students' educational performance.
