Glasgow in the 1840s (1998 edition)

The resulting lithographic folio, The Seat of War in the East, was the first of his many books. A second bridge was added in 1840 to carry Great Western Road across the river. Until within a few years ago, the Tower in question exhibited four turrets, which of course gave an imposing appearance to the structure.

William Simpson (1823

Elected an associate of the NWS in 1874 and a full member five years later, he was instrumental in transforming the society into the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours in 1884. Robert Douglas, Vicount Belhaven, purchased the barony and added the square tower middle distance to the old baronial hall.

TheGlasgowStory: William Simpson

Following his marriage in 1881, he settled in Willesden, Middlesex, and devoted himself to writing.

TheGlasgowStory: Old Bridge over the Kelvin

His autobiography would appear in print four years after his death at home on 17 April 1899. Robert Douglas, Vicount Belhaven, purchased the barony and added the square tower middle distance to the old baronial hall.

Glasgow in the 1840s (1998 edition)

He travelled to Bhilsa, to find Buddhist architecture, and to the source of the Ganges in the Himalayas, and to out-of-the-way Chitor, before the railway. It was demolished in the early 1870s.
