Yet, one might ask how this explains nurse migration in the absence of wage incentives, or, in contrast, the disregard for comparatively higher wage incentives offered in certain countries? Is it appropriate to refuse employment to nurses without work in their home countries? In the last quarter of the twentieth century developed countries have begun their transition from industrial to post-industrial society, which is based on the new generation of production forces, united global information-technological systems and gradual transition to the global economy. The substantial wage disparities found between nurses and other professional workers within the country are felt to be denigrating, a major source of frustration, and now a recognized motivating factor in attrition and international migration. Ethical international recruitment of health professionals: Will codes of practice protect developing country health systems? Across the world, refugees are amongst the most vulnerable, their living conditions make containing the virus extra challenging, and stigmatisation likely increases.
