Pierre Bonnard: The bright palette of a tortured soul

Interwoven throughout these dazzling reproductions are illuminating texts by acclaimed critics who draw on the latest research to present a multi-dimensional account of the artist. In that picture, Sérusier had learnt to abandon the illusion of three-dimensional space, creating a picture surface that had a decorative quality in its own right. Je cherche uniquement à faire quelque chose de personnel.

Ainsi du motif récurrent de la table : elle rappelle que le tableau est une surface plane ; elle renforce le ou illumine les couleurs si la nappe est blanche ; et elle rejette les personnages tout autour, si bien que l'œil se porte d'abord sur les objets. Another work of the same title The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York , begun in 1920 but only completed in 1939, shares the descending banister, but has panned back, allowing more of the house and the terrace itself to enter the composition, which is peopled by several characters and is interrupted dramatically by a lilac-coloured tree which divides the picture-surface, recalling some of Edgar Degas' pictures of the ballet. Although Bonnard avoided public attention, his work sold well during his life.
