Oh the precious stones that were hiding—the flowers that were already peeking out. She wrote perceptively on 1953, securing him an honorary doctorate at Oxford in 1947. This is a real find, as the main part of the photographic production of Hénon a talented photographer even if he turned out to be an unsavoury character is unfortunately lost, and only survives in the form of a few engravings reproduced in the press of the time.

In Total Eclipse, this month's much delayed British release of Agnieszka Holland's disappointing film about the volatile relationship between Rimbaud and fellow poet, Paul Verlaine, the appropriately pretty Leonardo DiCaprio plays the poet as a capricious brat; it was a role originally intended for River Phoenix. After his brief and undocumented stay in Cork Rimbaud probably travelled by ferry to Liverpool, then by train to London and thence across the channel to Dieppe. Little did the sports journalists realise that their idol was giving them a masterclass in Rimbaudian imagery. The move to bring Rimbaud and Verlaine together in the Pantheon began last year, when several writers—some gay, some French, and at least one of them American—launched a petition. By then Rimbaud had given up literature in favour of a steady, working life.

A Season in Abyssinia: An Impersonation of Arthur Rimbaud by Paul Strathern

It seems the author wrote the notes that eventually grew into this book while travelling through Abyssinia while working on a film about Rimbaud's life, though I couldn't find out any info on the film, or even if it was ever completed. We know that the ship endured a vicious storm around the Cape of Good Hope and nearly foundered.
