

Headquarter-subsidiary relationships in multinational corporations.

Stockholm School of Economics, Institute of International Business - Headquarters

A multinational corporation is a giant international firm that is registered in more than one country. The firm operates from its corporate headquarters in the home country, but it conducts business activities through its subsidiaries (branches of the company) across the globe. This firm both produces and sells goods and services.

Headquarters

The paper presents some considerations for future research and for practitioners and summarizes the contributions that make up this special issue on the role and functions of headquarters in multinational corporations. An interview-based study in Japanese subsidiaries of German MNCs has led to an article in Journal of World Business.

Bibliografías:

It identifies and explores the chronology for the development of middle Anglo-Saxon land-units within the Mercian provincia of the Magonsaete, proposing a reassessment of the timescale by when the latter people became the dominant group within the provincia. The theoretical framework used to guide this study was structural contingency theory SCT.

The role of headquarters in the contemporary MNC

The study drew the aspect of international transfers into the picture and investigated the role of expatriates in controlling subsidiaries.

The examples are real data sets and present real problems in terms of statistical analysis.

HQ

I distinguish three main types of negative mechanistic reasoning and subsume them under a new definition of mechanistic reasoning in the context of assessing medical interventions. A focus that bends too much towards formal control or too much towards informal control may threaten a company's existence.

The role of headquarters in the contemporary MNC

Second, I also returned to my earlier work on the strategic role of international assignments see my research program on with papers on the differential roles of different types of international assignments in knowledge transfer.
