Even though criticized, Hurston appeared to oppose integration based on pride and her sense of independence.

Dust Tracks on a Road

As an adult, Hurston often used Eatonville as a setting in her stories—it was a place where African Americans could live as they desired, independent of white society. Hurston recalled what she had seen of white male sexual dominance in the lumber camps in North Florida, and discussed it with Nunn.

Life, as it is, does not frighten me, since I have made my peace with the universe as I find it, and bow to its laws. She's acerbic in her observations;

I kept on writing them down. Many people saw the African American community as racism and segregation.

Living in Harlem in the 1920s, Hurston had befriended poets and , among several other writers. Hurston believed that the color of your skin counted for nothing, which was amazing and wonderful considering the times she lived in I wonder how trying to ignore Jim Crow and the other manifestations of the racist society she had to live in worked out for her in the end. Hurston was undoubtedly an intelligent woman, even before she went on in her education to become an anthropologist.
