There are two roads by which this Lake may be visited from Keswick. Many of the ancient buildings with their porches, projections, round chimnies and galleries have been displaced to make way for the docked, featureless, and memberless edifices of modern architecture; which look as if fresh brought upon wheels from the Foundry, where they had been cast.

Old Cumbria Gazetteer, Cockermouth

He recorded his surroundings, venturing into hazardous terrain where there were no access roads, no way of keeping dry and where the only places to shelter were shepherd's cottages. The embankment also, which has been raised round this Island for the sake of preserving the land, could only, it should seem, have been necessary in a few exposed points; and the artificial appearance which this has given to the whole spot is much to be regretted; not to speak of the infinite varieties of minute beauty which it must have destroyed.

Having spoken of the forms, surface, and colour of the mountains, let us descend into the Vallies. .

Select Views in Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancashire (1810)

The Vale in which it is situated is about four Miles in Circumference. The coppice woods, upon the sides of the mountains, retain russet leaves; the birch stands conspicuous with its silver stem and puce-coloured twigs; the hollies have come forth to view, with green leaves and scarlet berries, from among the deciduous trees whose summer foliage had concealed them; the ivy is now apparent upon the stems and boughs of the trees, and among the woody rocks.

OF THE BEST TIME FOR VISITING THE LAKES. Sunshine or shadow has little power to adorn the surface of such a wood; and the trees not carrying up their heads, the wind produces among them no majestic undulations. Geld sheep, M B on near side.
