I became so grateful for the little things in life- shelter from the rain and wind, a hot shower, stove to cook on, warm place to sleep, and dry clothes. We went to Arches, went on a hike, and then we went to Canyonlands to do a sunrise hike. If you haven't signed up already, go do it now! Never stop doing what you love and never stop pursuing happiness- that is what I feel I've learned from Pacific Discovery.

Pretty much the most amazing, crazy, challenging, and exciting itinerary I've ever seen. All in all, a tremendously valuable learning experience. Talking to others who have studied abroad, the third aspect of PD that I appreciated the most was being treated like an adult.

Carter thoroughly enjoyed himself while on the program as well! Every activity was meticulously planned, every place we stayed chosen for specific reasons, and every site we saw taught us something new. I'm also so glad I went right after I graduated, a time when I was a complete hot mess.

Before this trip, I never thought I would ever try sky diving but I did it and it ended up being one of the best experiences in my life. The program was as much fun as I've ever had, and more memorable than anything I have ever done, but what I value the most is how it challenged me to chew on the moral and intellectual complexities of the world that we live in. I did everything I ever wanted to do in my whole life and more on this trip and I couldn't be more satisfied.

I was never disappointed with food. This trip not only gave me the opportunity to explore a new part of the world and learn about the cultures there, but it also introduced me to an astounding and diverse group of fellow travelers, and my time with them couldn't have been more fun and perspective-changing.

However, once I got on the plane with my group and we landed in New Zealand that didn't matter anymore.

This showed itself in multiple ways, including making sure that my individual group meshed well together and that there was good energy throughout.
