Interest groups in American politics : pressure and power

Government activity has penetrated into every aspect of society and there are those who feel that the role of Federal government has gone too far. During the 1980s, as trade battles heated up, foreign companies and foundations, particularly from Japan, poured more money into funding lobbies, public relations firms, trade associations, and think tanks in Washington. And labor's overall contribution to organizations like these remains minuscule compared to the amount of money corporations spend on think tanks and policy groups -- perhaps less than one half of one percent.

Which are more powerful? British or American pressure groups?

They publicise an issue that is usually at odds with government policy or ideology and so are rarely powerful in their persuasive techniques, although the Countryside Alliance managed to water down laws against fox hunting which shows that some are still very powerful.
