Agricultural development and land tenure in India

In Bengal the assessment was made permanent; and it has not been raised with the extension of cultivation, it now bears a ratio of about 35 percent, on the rental. Though the amount of land revenue was pushed high by zamindars and other speculators bidding against each other, the actual collection varied from year to year and seldom came up to official expectations.

Land Reforms(II): Zamindari Abolition and Tenancy Reforms

The occupancy tenants of Bengal and the cultivating village owner of Bihar, now practically occupy the position of the peasant-proprietors of Europe, and are subject to the magic of property. In the absence of recorded land rights, they cannot prove that they are agriculturists.
