And like Delacroix, Wall too chose for a prominent red color palette, suggesting passion and supporting the chaos in the scene. In The Destroyed Room, Wall not only hints at the creative process, but also engages with the questions raised by Conceptual artists of the time.

Jeff Wall Obituary

Transparency in lightbox, 142,5 x 204,5 cm. Only in his first two staged photographs — The Destroyed Room and Picture for Women — the studio literally comes in the picture. Wall photographed actors in a landscape located outside his home town, Vancouver, at times when similar weather conditions prevailed over a period of five months.

It had nothing to do with the Afghan war, but the subjects needed to be soldiers because it seemed important that they would have died in an official capacity, that would surely give them something to talk about.

'A Sudden Gust of Wind (after Hokusai)', Jeff Wall, 1993

A sheaf of papers in her hand has been dispersed by the gust and their trajectory, over the centre of the image, creates a sense of dynamic movement. By creating a large-scale, fictional image that recalls the grandeur and narrative of classical painting, Wall challenges the documentary role that photography often plays.
