Fear and Trembling/Repetition (Kierkegaard's Writings): Soren Kierkegaard: 9780691020266

Insofar as the object viewed belongs to the external world, then how the observer is constituted is probably less important, or, more correctly than what is necessary for the observation is something irrelevant to his deeper nature. The poet can attain to the movement of infinite resignation, performed by tragic heroes such as Agamemnon who sacrificed his daughter to placate the gods, but this gesture will forever remain only a surrogate of Abraham's absolute faith.

Abraham simply can not speak. Abraham by-passed all his ethical obligations to perform what God asked of him directly.

Kierkegaard's Writings, VI, Volume 6

Kierkegaard's deepest passion is not merely the ethical, not merely the ethical-religious, but the ethical-religious paradox; it is Christianity itself, — such as this exhibits itself to his apprehension.
