Coalfield citizens have been pointing out for decades that one of the major and often unheralded impacts of strip mining, especially in small rural communities, is the effect it has had — and continues to have — on driving people out of those communities. They enjoyed their natural surroundings, taking to the hills and woods, hunting the wildlife, searching for ginseng, or just wandering in the outdoors. A major push for increased coal development began in the 1960s, with coal then mined in more than 25 states, East and West.
