In 1663 a separate room was applied for in the new storehouse at Portsmouth for use as a workroom, 'as seamen and carpenters will never agree to work together. James, Duke of York, the King's brother, afterwards James II, was made Lord High Admiral—an appointment which realised the ideas of Monson, who had written earlier: 'The way to settle things is to appoint an Admiral, young, heroical, and of a great blood. At these 'places of reception' as they were called, the Commissioners were to appoint an agent, and to provide 'a physician if need be and chirurgeon, and nurses, fire, candle, linen, medicaments, and all things necessary,' but in 'as husbandly and thrifty a manner' as might be.

the appointment as Commissioner at Deptford and Woolwich in 1684, and then on the Special Commission of 1686-8. His admonitions to the offenders, though sometimes a little unctuous, are as a rule in the best Pepysian style. About this Item: Franklin Classics, United States, 2018.

Review: "Pepys's Navy: Ships, Men and Warfare 1649"

It is fortunate for the student of naval administration during the Restoration period that the 'Sea Manuscripts' in the Pepysian Library include two 'Discourses' upon naval abuses written at the beginning of the period, which enable us to understand some of the difficulties with which Pepys and his colleagues had to contend. Thus the captains were allowed a 'dead pay' apiece on the sea-books 'for their retinues'; and in harbour no less than four varieties of dead pay were recognised, including wages and victuals paid to men for keeping ships 'which long since had no being. A Character of England as it was lately presented in a Letter to a Noble Man of France.

Pepys began by borrowing £40 of him, and then came to dislike him. Efforts had been already made to prevent embezzlement by adopting special modes of manufacture for the King's rope, sails, and pennants, and by marking other stores with the broad arrow; but there were some things, such as nails and some other kinds of ironwork, which could not be thus marked.

Thus there was a deficit of £814,393. Yet associated with all this pomp is a sense of humour, usually full-flavoured, but on occasion as subtle and delicate as need be, and finding its way even into the more dismal kinds of official correspondence.
