Leadership in the Profession of Arms

Humans fight as individuals and as groups. The Army needs to reflect on the strengths which have sustained it in this period, and consider how well we self-police ourselves on the battlefield and in garrison, the extent of our ability to care for Soldiers and their families, and the broad development of Army professionals. In part this reflects a failure to set clear political objectives.

Others are not so kind and paint a picture of mindless robots simply following orders. Beyond initial acceptance into the ranks of the profession of arms, it is the profession, through the evaluation by its leadership at various levels and not solely the desire of the individual military member, that determines who remains and who advances in the profession—and who must leave, again according to publicly stated standards promulgated under authority of law.

The Profession of Arms

Society invests much—its safety and security, its hopes and ideals, much of its treasure, and the best of its men and women—in the Armed Forces.

Leadership in the Profession of Arms

The disparity in performance between amateurs and professionals is so great that without air supremacy and all the other technological advances available modern armies won't take the field. It requires them to have a working understanding of the context and complimentary activities associated with that role, including to potentially undertake the roles of those immediately above them in the chain of command, for short durations.

Section 3: The Profession of Arms in Canada

This troublesome task is further exasperated because the trust of the public ultimately certifies a profession.

The Profession of Arms

The LPA course provides students with the opportunity to focus on themselves as leaders, reflect on past performance, examine personal strengths and weaknesses, develop new competencies and strengthen their personal character to enhance their ability to lead in a complex and dynamic environment. Finally, a critical element of this corporateness is the importance of professional self-identity.
