Wilt, 1962: The Night of 100 Points and the Dawn of a New Era

Balls would bounce off of typical firm rims, whereas balls near the rim in Hershey were apt to get a good roll and fall in.

I doubt it This runs as a string of meaningless name-dropping because we don't know who they are.

Wilt, 1962: The Night of 100 Points and the Dawn of a New Era by Gary M. Pomerantz, Paperback

The game was not televised; no New York sportswriters showed up; and a fourteen-year-old local boy ran onto the court when Chamberlain scored his hundredth point, shook his hand, and then ran off with the basketball. Pomerantz tracked down Knicks and Philadelphia Warriors, fans, journalists, team officials, other NBA stars of the era, and basketball historians, conducting more than 250 interviews in all, to recreate in painstaking detail the game that announced the Dipper's greatness. In 1962, the National Basketball Association, stepchild to the college game, was searching for its identity.

The March 2 game in Hershey meant little to Chamberlain. The game was not televised and the print media coverage was limited; the author's work was to conduct more than 250 extensive interviews to all the possible protagonists. Unbelievably, there were only 37 blacks in the NBA.

Chapter 1: The Dipper in Harlem There is a photograph of the Dipper with James Baldwin on a Harlem street corner, the big man in a slim suit and snap-brim fedora, tilting his frame toward the writer, seemingly half his size. Pomerantz tracked down Knicks and Philadelphia Warriors, fans, journalists, team officials, other NBA stars of the era, and basketball historians, conducting more than 250 interviews in all, to recreate in painstaking detail the game that announced the Dipper's greatness.

I remember when Wilt appeared on the Sunday Ed Sullivan show to be congratulated. But witnessing one of the greatest individual sports performances ever at age 13 is a memory I cherish. Not covered by TV, barely covered in radio and not recorded by teams or networks, and only a handful of photos and 2 reporters.

You feel the aura of his isolation as he towered above the rest of us in life, and you wish more than ever he was still around because of his very individuality. Instead there is a little of each, but all left me wanting a bit more.

The Warriors' PR director said an impossible 40,000 people claimed to have seen the game, and some even testified it took place in Madison Square Garden. He raced outside of the Hershey Sports Arena and into the night.
